Nine patients with blunt traumatic rupture of the thoracic aorta sustained during motor vehicle accidents underwent emergency operations. Six of the patients were admitted during the early stage of hospitalization, when medical management was deemed appropriate. Five of the six patients were in shock on admission and had systolic blood pressures less than 85 mmHg. The diagnosis was established at operation in all nine patients and after initial medical therapy in three. Three patients died from exsanguinating hemorrhage in the first few hours after initial injury; five patients died in spite of immediate operations. Five patients are currently alive and free of significant deficits. One patient, who experienced distal ischemia of the left upper extremity following aortic cross-clamping, was left with significant left upper extremity ischemia. This patient subsequently required a left arm amputation. Closed chest compression was utilized in five patients during the initial period following injury. Two of these patients survived and are free of deficits, while three patients were not supported by cardiopulmonary bypass (CPB). The fourth patient was supported by CPB following the initial period of closed chest compression. He survived but developed severe paraplegia. One patient, who developed acute mental status change after initial operation, required neurosurgical intervention for spinal cord injury.--- abstract: 'We consider a hybrid operational-control problem of the LAD system with a large number of resource controllers. The resource controllers are assumed to have a priori known first-order dynamics and controllable inputs. We propose a model predictive control (MPC) scheme that approximates the dynamic planning problem of the resource controllers. The MPC controller synthesizes the controller as a series of cascaded sub-problems and hence the controller is independent of the number of controllers. To obtain the terminal controller of the MPC scheme, we implement an optimal control
